

Congressman Blumenauer returned to his Alma Mater, Lewis & Clark Law School, on Friday, October 8, 2010 to meet with current environmental law students and discuss an update to his 2000 Lewis & Clark Environmental Law Review article, Entrepreneurial Environmentalism: A New Approach for the New Millennium.

More than a dozen of the school's top students in the field came to learn about Congressman Blumenauer's work to strengthen environmental protections and to discuss Oregon's role as a leader in land use and environmental laws. The broad conversation ranged from questions on what more could be done to alleviate urban air quality problems, to a discussion on how to better frame the environmental law discussion in the public sphere and provide a legal framework for the uniform integration of household-sized clean energy devices in urban areas. Students were thrilled to meet Congressman Blumenauer and learn more about the legislative side of environmental regulation, and came away with a new and practical perspective on their own day to day legal studies.
